General Introduction

Sports play a significant role in our society, providing entertainment, inspiring passion, and creating a sense of community. In Algeria, sports are an important part of the national culture, with millions of people following their favorite teams and athletes through newspapers, TV programs, and online media outlets. The way in which sports news is presented in the media can have a powerful impact on public perceptions, attitudes, and behaviors. This is where framing theory comes in.

Framing theory is a framework that explains how media messages are constructed to influence the way audiences interpret and understand events. It suggests that the way a story is framed can affect the way audiences perceive its meaning and significance. In the context of sports news, framing can be particularly powerful. The media can shape the public's perception of athletes, teams, and sports events, influencing the way people view sports as a whole.

By exploring the framing of sports news in Algeria, this study aims to contribute to a deeper understanding of the role of the media in shaping public perceptions of sports and the impact of different framing strategies on audience attitudes and behaviors. The significance of this research lies in its contribution to the field of media studies by examining how sports news is created and framed in Algeria context. By analyzing the language strategies and key tools used in the framing process, this study provided insight into the influence of the media discourse on public perception and understanding of sports events.

The research problem addressed in this study is the need to understand how language choices in sports news headlines shape the article story. By exploring the framing techniques employed in Algerian sports newspapers, the research question guiding this study includes:

1. How do Algerian sports newspapers frame their news headline?
2. What are the dominate frames used in the headlines of Algerian sports newspaper?.

To answer these questions the study formulates hypotheses related to propose that the framing of sports news in Algerian media will demonstrate the use of specific elements and key tools that influence public perception.

The organization of this thesis is as follows: chapter one provided a comprehensive overview of research background, research problem, research question, and hypothesis, it set the stage for the subsequent chapters, chapter two delves into the theoretical foundations of framing theory, highlighting its relevance and applicability in the realm of sports journalism. This chapter explores key concepts and components of Entman's Framing Theory

Chapter three serves as the core of the thesis, presenting the methodology employed in the study. It describes the data collection process, the selection of Algerian sports newspapers, and qualitative content analysis approach used in analyzing the framing of sports news headlines. This chapter also outlines the findings and discusses their implications. Lastly, the general conclusion summarizes the key findings, their significance, and offers recommendations for future research in the field.

Through examination of sports news framing, this thesis aims to contribute to the existing body of knowledge in media studies and enhance our understanding of the role of language in shaping public perception. By analyzing the tools and elements used in the Algerian media.

Chapter One: Discourse in Newspaper

Headlines

Introduction

Sports journalism has held a pivotal place in the media landscape for quite some time. It has had a significant influence on how the general public views sporting events and athletes. In the age of digital media, this influence has only grown as millions of people worldwide follow their favorite teams and players through various media outlets. Headlines, in particular, play a crucial role in presenting sports news as they can greatly impact readers' interest in a story. This chapter provides an extensive overview of previous studies that have examined sports newspaper headlines, identifying gaps in the literature that the current study aims to fill. It emphasizes the importance of headlines in shaping public perceptions of sports events and athletes, reviews previous studies that utilized discourse analysis, and outlines research questions to be addressed.

1.1 Examining Power Relations in News Headlines

Sports journalism holds significant influence in shaping public perceptions and attitudes towards sports events and athletes. Within this realm, newspaper headlines emerge as a crucial element, serving as the initial point of contact between readers and the news story. The power of a well-crafted headline lies in its ability to capture attention, evoke curiosity, and provide a glimpse into the essence of the article. With their succinct yet impactful nature, sports headlines possess the potential to shape readers' expectations and interpretations, setting the tone for their engagement with the news content.

Previous research has focused on analyzing the linguistic features of sports newspaper headlines and their role in shaping the discourse of sports journalism. For instance, Machin and Van Leeuwen (2007) used discourse analysis to study the role of media texts in constructing and maintaining social power relations, highlighting the ways in which media texts contribute to social inequalities. As a researcher studying the relationship between sports media and public attitudes, it is important to recognize the significant influence that newspaper headlines can have on shaping public perceptions of sports events and athletes. Previous research has demonstrated the role of linguistic features in constructing and maintaining social power relations in media texts, and highlighted the need for critical analysis of sports journalism to uncover underlying ideologies and power relations. Carvalho's (2014) study on discourse analysis and media texts offers analytical tools for critically reading and analyzing sports newspaper headlines. By applying such analytical tools, researchers can gain a deeper understanding of the ways in which newspaper headlines construct meanings and shape public attitudes towards sports events and athletes. Such analysis can help researchers better comprehend the broader social and cultural implications of sports media, and contribute to a more nuanced understanding of the role of sports journalism in society.

These studies demonstrate the importance of understanding the role of newspaper headlines in shaping public perceptions and attitudes towards sports events and athletes, and the need for critical analysis of sports journalism to uncover the underlying ideologies and power relations in media texts.

1.2 Studies on Discourse in Newspaper Headlines

1.2.1 Overview of Previous Research

Discourse analysis is a research method that focuses on how language is used in communication to construct meaning, power, and ideology. This method can be applied to various fields of study, such as sports journalism. In this field, discourse analysis can help examine how sports newspaper headlines use linguistic features to shape public perceptions and attitudes towards sports events and athletes. Previous research has shown that these headlines can influence how people view the outcomes of competitions, the performance of teams and players, and the social issues related to sports. For example, Machin and Van Leeuwen's (2005) study analyzed how newspaper headlines framed different aspects of the 2006 World Cup in Germany, such as national identity, cultural diversity, violence, and corruption. They found that the headlines used various discursive strategies to emphasize or downplay certain aspects of the event, depending on the ideological orientation of the newspapers. Therefore, it is important to conduct critical analysis of sports journalism to reveal the underlying ideologies and power relations that are embedded in media texts.

One of the studies that provides analytical tools for critically reading and analyzing media texts is Carvalho's (2008) study. This study suggests paying attention to aspects such as word choice, framing, positioning, discursive strategies and processes. These aspects can reveal how media texts construct meanings and shape public attitudes. By using these tools, researchers can gain a deeper understanding of how media texts contribute to social inequalities and maintain social power relations.

Word choice refers to the selection of specific words or expressions over others that have similar meanings but different connotations (Fahnestock, 2011). For example, using words like "terrorist" or "freedom fighter" can imply different judgments about a group or an action. Framing refers to the way a topic or an issue is presented or defined by highlighting certain aspects over others. For example, framing a sports event as a "clash" or a "celebration" can evoke different emotions in readers. Positioning refers to the way social actors are represented or related to each other in a text. For example, positioning an athlete as a "hero" or a "villain" can affect how readers perceive their actions or motives.

Discursive strategies refer to the ways social actors use language to achieve certain goals or effects in communication. For example, using metaphors or analogies can help explain complex concepts or create associations between different domains. Discursive processes refer to the ways social actors interact with each other through language in specific contexts or situations. For example, using questions or commands can indicate different types of relationships or roles between speakers.

By applying these analytical tools to media texts, researchers can uncover how meanings are constructed and communicated through language in sports journalism. They can also identify how ideologies and power relations are reproduced or challenged through discourse.

1.2.2 Linguistic Features of Newspaper Headlines

Newspaper headlines are a fascinating topic of linguistic analysis as they employ various strategies to attract readers' attention and convey information succinctly. They also reveal how headlines can vary across languages, genres and platforms. In this text, there are three studies that are related to the linguistic features of newspaper headlines, but they focus on different aspects and use different methods.

The first study by Abdulla and Salih (2012) aims to investigate the morphology, semantics and syntax of headlines and to compare them with ordinary language. Analyzed and found a corpus of headlines from various newspapers and that the headlines use short words, omit verbs and articles, employ word play, noun strings, alliteration and ambiguity. They also discuss how headlines reflect ideological and cultural values.

The second study by Alipour (2016) compares the linguistic means used in English and Persian sport newspaper headlines. In his study, he examined a sample of 200 headlines from four newspapers, which included two English and two Persian publications. He identified some similarities and differences between them. It was found that both languages used nominalization, ellipsis, puns, metaphors and rhetorical questions. However, there were differences in their use of tense, voice, modality, and lexical choices.

The third study by Gligorić et al. (2021) proposes to study the linguistic characteristics of news headline success using a large-scale dataset of online field experiments conducted on Popular website Upworthy.com. They formulate hypotheses about the linguistic features that are associated with statistically superior headlines based on prior literature and a pilot partition of the data. They plan to test their hypotheses on a larger partition of the data that will become available after their registered report protocol is published. Their results will contribute to resolving competing hypotheses about the linguistic features that affect text appeal.

These studies show that newspaper headlines are a rich source of linguistic analysis as they employ various strategies to attract readers' attention and convey information succinctly. They also reveal how headlines can vary across languages, genres and platforms. By studying these variations, we can gain insights into how language works in different contexts and how it influences our perception of reality.

1.2.3 Approaches for Analyzing Newspaper Headlines

In the field of discourse analysis, there are various approaches that scholars have used to analyze sports newspaper headlines. One approach is the rhetorical approach, which considers the ways in which language is used to persuade and influence the audience. In his book, "Arguing and Thinking: A Rhetorical Approach to Social Psychology," Billig (1996) applies a rhetorical lens to the analysis of social psychology, emphasizing the persuasive power of language. In the context of sports news, a rhetorical approach can be used to understand how journalists use language to frame events and influence public perceptions.

Another approach Critical discourse analysis (CDA) is an interdisciplinary approach that draws on various disciplines such as linguistics, sociology, psychology and philosophy to study how language is used in social contexts to construct and challenge power relations and social inequality.

According to Norman Fairclough (1989), a leading scholar in CDA, language is not neutral but is shaped by and shapes social structures and relationships. Therefore, analyzing language can provide insights into how power relations are constructed and contested in different discursive practices. Fairclough's model of discourse analysis consists of three dimensions: text (the linguistic features of a text), interaction (the production and interpretation of a text), and context (the social and cultural situation of a text). CDA involves analyzing these three dimensions to uncover how language is used to maintain or challenge social norms and power structures.

To conduct CDA, researchers employ various tools and techniques, such as identifying the linguistic features that reveal power relations, examining the context and social actors involved, and analyzing the discursive strategies used to legitimize or challenge dominant discourses. Discursive strategies are ways of using language to achieve certain effects or goals, such as persuasion, justification or manipulation.

Another approach to discourse analysis is genre analysis, which focuses on the structural and functional features of different types of texts in specific contexts, such as academic or research settings. John Swales (1990), a prominent scholar in genre analysis, emphasizes the importance of understanding the communicative purposes and conventions of different genres to effectively produce and interpret texts in specific settings.

Genre analysis involves identifying the communicative purpose of a text, examining the rhetorical moves used to achieve that purpose, and analyzing the discourse community that the text belongs to. A rhetorical move is a section or part of a text that serves a specific function or purpose in relation to the overall communicative goal of the text. A discourse community is a group of people who share common goals, values and practices related to a particular field or domain.

By understanding the conventions and expectations of different genres, writers can effectively communicate with their intended audiences and produce texts that meet the requirements of their respective fields.

Finally, a fourth approach that has been used to analyze sports newspaper headlines is the global media discourse approach, which considers the ways in which media texts reflect and reproduce global power relations. In "Global media discourse: A critical introduction," Machin and Van Leeuwen (2007) explore the relationship between media discourse and global power relations, highlighting the ways in which media discourse reflects and reinforces global inequalities. In the context of sports news, the global media discourse approach can be used to identify the ways in which media discourse reflects and reinforces global power relations in the realm of sports.

In summary, discourse analysis provides a rich framework for the analysis of sports newspaper headlines. By applying various approaches, scholars have been able to identify the ways in which language is used to persuade and influence, maintain or challenge power relations, conform to or challenge genre conventions, and reflect and reinforce global power relations. Through a critical analysis of these approaches, this study aims to contribute to a deeper understanding of the role of the media in shaping public perceptions of sports events and athletes

1.2.4 Findings from Previous Studies on Discourse in Newspaper Headlines

Discourse analysis is a valuable tool for understanding the role of media in shaping public perceptions and attitudes. These studies highlight the different approaches and methods used in discourse analysis in the context of sports news media., while Machin and Van Leeuwen's (2005) book offers an introduction to critical discourse analysis and its application to global media., these studies demonstrate the versatility of discourse analysis and its value in studying the ways in which media discourses shape public perceptions and attitudes towards sports.

1.4 Studies on Newspaper Headlines in Relation to Discourse

The relationship between discourse and newspaper headline studies is crucial in understanding the power dynamics and ideological representations that are embedded in news headlines. Discourse analysis helps to uncover the implicit meanings and assumptions that are communicated through headlines, such as their use of language, tone, and framing Van Dijk, T. A. (1988). For example, consider the following headline: "Illegal immigrants flood our nation's borders." A discourse analysis of this headline could reveal its underlying bias and its framing of the issue of immigration. The use of the term "illegal immigrants" implies criminality, while the term "flood" suggests an overwhelming and dangerous presence.

Both of these linguistic choices work together to construct a particular representation of the issue and the people affected by it. Analyzing headlines using discourse analysis can therefore shed light on the ways in which power, ideology, and cultural values are communicated through language. By doing so, it can provide a critical perspective on the news and help to uncover the various social and political forces that shape our understanding of the world around us. Moreover, discourse analysis can also reveal the ways in which newspaper headlines are used to reinforce dominant ideologies and perpetuate stereotypes or stigmatizations of certain groups or individuals. For example, headlines that use words such as "thug," "criminal," or "terrorist" to describe people of a certain race or ethnicity can perpetuate harmful stereotypes and contribute to the marginalization and discrimination of those groups.

Furthermore, analyzing the relationship between discourse and newspaper headlines can also help to uncover the ways in which power dynamics are at play within the media industry itself. For example, media owners or editors may use headlines to push a particular agenda or to advance their own interests, and analyzing the language and framing of these headlines can reveal these underlying power dynamics.

Overall, understanding the relationship between discourse and newspaper headlines through discourse analysis is crucial for developing a critical understanding of the news media and its role in shaping public opinion and discourse. It helps to reveal the various ways in which language and power intersect in the news, and the ways in which these intersecting forces can have real-world consequences for individuals and society as a whole Van Dijk, T. A. (1988).

1.3.1 The Use of Discourse Analysis in Newspaper Headline Studies

Discourse analysis is a methodological approach that is commonly used in the analysis of newspaper headlines. It involves examining various aspects of discourse such as syntax, semantics, and pragmatics in order to uncover the underlying meanings and assumptions communicated through language.

In the context of newspaper headline analysis, discourse analysis can be used to examine the ways in which language is used to frame an issue or construct a particular representation of an event or individual. Syntax refers to the grammatical structure of a sentence, and an analysis of syntax in headlines can reveal the ways in which words and phrases are arranged to convey a particular message.

Semantics, on the other hand, refers to the meanings of words and phrases and how they relate to each other. An analysis of semantics in headlines can reveal how certain words are used to evoke particular associations or connotations, and how these associations contribute to the overall framing of an issue.

Finally, pragmatics refers to the ways in which language is used in social contexts to achieve specific goals. An analysis of pragmatics in headlines can reveal how language is used to influence the attitudes and beliefs of the reader, and how the headlines are constructed to achieve particular rhetorical effects.

Overall, the use of discourse analysis in the analysis of newspaper headlines allows researchers to uncover the underlying meanings and assumptions communicated through language and to reveal the various social and political forces that shape our understanding of the world around us.

1.3.2 Discourse Analysis Approaches

There are various approaches to discourse analysis that can be applied to the analysis of newspaper headlines. Some of the most commonly used approaches include:

Critical Discourse Analysis (CDA): This approach focuses on the ways in which language is used to reproduce power relations and ideologies. In analyzing newspaper headlines, CDA would examine the ways in which language is used to reinforce or challenge dominant social, political, or cultural norms and values.

Multimodal Discourse Analysis (MDA): This approach focuses on the interplay between different modes of communication, such as language, image, and sound. In analyzing newspaper headlines, MDA would examine the ways in which different modes work together to produce meaning and construct representations of social and political issues.

Systemic Functional Linguistics (SFL): This approach focuses on the ways in which language is used to achieve specific communicative goals. In analyzing newspaper headlines, SFL would examine the ways in which language is used to convey a particular message or perspective to the reader.

Other approaches that can be used to analyze newspaper headlines include Conversation Analysis, Discursive Psychology, and Ethnography of Communication, among others. The choice of approach will depend on the research question, the data being analyzed, and the theoretical framework being used.

1.3.3 Discourse and Power in Newspaper Headlines

Power relations are often reflected and constructed through the use of language in newspaper headlines. This is because language is a powerful tool that can be used to shape and influence public opinion and discourse. Newspaper headlines can reflect and reinforce existing power relations, as well as construct new ones.

One way in which power relations are reflected in newspaper headlines is through the issue of representation. Newspaper headlines often represent people, groups, and events in certain ways, and these representations can reflect existing power relations Entman, R. M. (1993). For example, headlines that describe people of a certain race or ethnicity as "thugs" or "criminals" can perpetuate negative stereotypes and contribute to the marginalization of those groups.

Another way in which power relations are reflected in newspaper headlines is through issues of bias. Bias can be reflected in the language, tone, and framing of headlines. For example, a headline that describes a political event in a positive way may reflect a bias towards a particular political party or ideology. Similarly, a headline that uses emotive language or sensationalizes an event may reflect a bias towards attracting readership or increasing sales.

Ideology is another important factor in the construction and reflection of power relations in newspaper headlines. Newspaper headlines often reflect the dominant ideology of the society in which they are produced. This can be seen in the language used to describe certain groups or events, as well as in the framing of issues. For example, a headline that describes an event as a "terrorist attack" may reflect the dominant ideology of a society that is concerned with national security and terrorism.

Overall, it is important to recognize the ways in which power relations are reflected and constructed through the use of language in newspaper headlines. By doing so, we can gain a critical perspective on the news and uncover the various social and political forces that shape our understanding of the world around us.

1.3.4 Criticisms of Discourse Analysis in Newspaper Headline Studies

Discourse analysis is an important tool for analyzing newspaper headlines, as it can uncover the implicit meanings and assumptions that are communicated through language. However, the use of discourse analysis in the study of newspaper headlines has also been subject to a number of criticisms. In this section, we will explore some of the common criticisms of discourse analysis in this context and discuss how these criticisms can be addressed, as well as the limitations of using discourse analysis in this way.

One of the main criticisms of discourse analysis in newspaper headline studies is the issue of reliability. Discourse analysis relies heavily on interpretation and the subjective analysis of linguistic features, which can lead to differences in interpretation between researchers. This means that different researchers may analyze the same headline and come to different conclusions about its meaning or underlying bias. In order to address this criticism, it is important to ensure that the researchers who conduct the analysis are well-trained in the method and have a clear and consistent understanding of the key concepts and approaches. It is also important to use multiple analysts to analyze the same headlines and compare their findings to increase the reliability of the analysis.

Another criticism of discourse analysis is the issue of validity. Validity refers to the extent to which the analysis accurately captures the intended phenomenon. In the case of newspaper headlines, it is possible that discourse analysis may not be able to capture the full meaning of a headline due to the limited space and language constraints. It is also possible that the researcher may not have access to the necessary contextual information, such as the background of the story or the audience for which the headline is intended. To address this criticism, it is important to ensure that the researchers have access to as much contextual information as possible and to acknowledge any limitations or gaps in the analysis.

A further criticism of discourse analysis in this context is the issue of subjectivity. Discourse analysis is inherently subjective, as it relies on the researcher's interpretation of the linguistic features of the headline. This subjectivity can lead to concerns about bias in the analysis, and it can be difficult to ensure that the researcher's personal biases do not influence the analysis. To address this criticism, it is important to use a clear and consistent approach to the analysis, and to encourage researchers to be transparent about their own biases and how they may have influenced the analysis.

Despite these criticisms, the use of discourse analysis in the study of newspaper headlines remains a valuable tool for understanding the ways in which power, ideology, and cultural values are communicated through language. By taking a critical perspective on the news, discourse analysis can help to reveal the various social and political forces that shape our understanding of the world around us. However, it is important to be aware of the limitations of discourse analysis and to address the criticisms that have been leveled against it in order to ensure that the analysis is as reliable, valid, and objective as possible.

1.4. Conclusion

The first chapter of the text emphasizes the significant role played by newspaper headlines in shaping public perception and attitudes. Previous research has focused on the linguistic features of headlines and analyzed them using methods like Critical Discourse Analysis and Multimodal Discourse Analysis. These studies have revealed that the language and power intersect in newspaper headlines and can perpetuate stereotypes or stigmatizations of certain groups or individuals. However, discourse analysis used in the study of newspaper headlines has faced criticisms for its reliability, validity, and subjectivity.

Framing theory has provided a useful framework for understanding how the language used in news headlines can shape and influence public perception and understanding of social issues. The theory suggests that the media can select certain aspects of an issue and amplify or downplay them to create a particular frame or narrative that influences public opinion.

Despite the criticisms, analyzing newspaper headlines using discourse analysis has highlighted the importance of developing a critical understanding of the news media and its role in shaping public opinion and discourse. By using framing theory, we can better comprehend how language in news headlines can impact public perception.

Chapter Two: Framing Theory

Introduction

The media has a powerful influence on shaping public opinion, particularly through its use of agenda-setting, priming, and framing techniques. Framing theory offers a useful lens through which we can examine how news is constructed and its impact on audiences. In this chapter, we utilize framing theory to examine sports news coverage in Algerian newspapers. Our focus is on analyzing the framing of performance and tactics. We also discuss how Algerian sports newspapers use neutral frames to present information in a clear and objective manner. Through the lens of framing theory, we gain a better understanding of how the media shapes public perception of sports coverage in Algeria. We provide clear definitions and examples of key framing theory concepts, such as performance and tactics frames, and neutral frames. Additionally, we use headings, subheadings, transitions, and relevant sources to support our arguments and findings.

2.1 Definition and History of Framing Theory

Framing theory can be defined as the study of how media messages are constructed to influence the ways in which audiences perceive and interpret information, Entman, R. M. (1993). This theory posits that the media presents information through a particular "frame," or lens, that shapes the audience's understanding of the information. The concept of framing has been used to study various aspects of communication, including political communication, media effects, and health communication.

Another key researcher in the development of framing theory is William Gamson, who introduced the concept of "strategic framing" as a way to understand the ways in which political actors strategically use framing to advance their agendas Gamson, W. A. (1992). Todd Gitlin has also made significant contributions to the field by exploring the role of media in shaping public discourse and the impact of news media on political activism Gitlin, T. (1980).

Similarly, Stephen Reese has focused on the role of media framing in shaping public opinion on issues such as terrorism and climate change. The evolution of framing theory has led to the development of various theoretical frameworks and approaches, such as the notion of framesets, which involves the interplay between different frames, and the concept of priming, which refers to the way in which exposure to certain frames can prime an audience to interpret subsequent information in a particular way Reese, S. D., Gandy Jr, O. H., & Grant, A. E. (2001).

The ongoing development and application of framing theory continues to have significant implications for how we understand the role of media in shaping public opinion and has the potential to inform strategies for effective communication in a range of fields.

In addition to the aforementioned researchers, many other scholars have contributed to the development of framing theory. One of the key concepts in framing theory is the idea of frames, which are defined as "schemata of interpretation that enable individuals to locate, perceive, identify, and label occurrences within their life space and the world at large" (Gamson & Modigliani, 1989, p. 143). Another important concept is framesets, which refer to the "collections of frames that define a problem or issue and provide a basis for making judgments about it" (Reese et al., 2001, p. 11).

Among the scholars who have contributed to the development of framing theory are David Snow and Robert Benford, who introduced the concept of frame alignment, which refers to the process by which individuals connect their personal beliefs and values with the frames presented in media messages (Snow, Rochford Jr, Worden, & Benford, 1986). Similarly, William Gamson and Andre Modigliani proposed the concept of frame amplification, which refers to the ways in which media can amplify certain frames and downplay others, ultimately shaping public perception of an issue. Another important contribution was made by Shanto Iyengar, who developed the concept of agenda setting, which refers to the ways in which media can influence which issues are considered important by the public Iyengar, S. (1991).

Overall, the contributions of these and many other scholars have helped to shape our understanding of framing theory and its importance in communication research. By examining how messages are constructed and presented in media, and how this can impact audience perception and interpretation, framing theory has provided valuable insights into the role of media in shaping public opinion

2.2. Origins of Framing Theory

Framing theory originated in the field of sociology in the 1970s and was first introduced by Erving Goffman in his 1974 book, "Frame Analysis: An Essay on the Organization of Experience." Goffman's work focused on how individuals interpret and make sense of their experiences based on the frameworks, or frames, that they use to understand the world around them.

In the decades following Goffman's work, scholars in various fields, including communication, psychology, and political science, have built upon his ideas and expanded the theory of framing. In communication, framing is often defined as the way in which information is presented or framed to influence the way people perceive it Goffman, E. (1974).

The early framing research primarily focused on news media and how they framed political events or issues. Researchers found that media framing had a significant impact on public opinion and political outcomes. Over time, the concept of framing has been applied to various domains, including health communication, environmental communication, and marketing.

In recent years, there has been a growing interest in exploring how social media and digital communication have transformed the way framing works. With the emergence of new technologies, people have more control over the information they consume, and they can selectively choose which frames to accept or reject. This has led to new research on how individuals engage with and interpret framed messages in digital spaces.

Overall, the evolution of framing theory has been marked by interdisciplinary collaborations and an expanding scope of inquiry, from news media to social media, from politics to health communication, and from individual-level to societal-level effects.

2.2.2 Theoretical Underpinnings of Framing Theory

Framing theory is rooted in several theoretical traditions, including sociology, psychology, and communication. One of the primary theoretical foundations of framing theory is Goffman's concept of "frame analysis," which emphasizes how individuals use language and communication to make sense of their experiences and construct meaning. Goffman argued that frames act as mental structures that individuals use to interpret the world around them, and that they are essential in shaping the way individuals perceive and understand social phenomena.

Another theoretical foundation of framing theory is the concept of agenda-setting, which was first introduced by McCombs and Shaw in 1972. Agenda-setting theory posits that the media has the power to influence what topics and issues the public considers important by giving them prominence in news coverage. Framing theory builds upon agenda-setting by suggesting that the way the media presents issues can have a significant impact on how people interpret and evaluate them. For example, if the media presents an issue in a negative frame, it can influence people to have a more negative perception of the issue, even if they previously had a neutral or positive view.

Primarily, framing theory also draws on social psychology, particularly the work of cognitive psychologists such as Kahneman and Tversky. Their research on cognitive heuristics and biases suggests that people tend to use mental shortcuts or heuristics when making decisions, and that these shortcuts can be influenced by the way information is presented to them. Framing theory argues that the way information is framed can activate different cognitive heuristics and biases, which can lead people to make different judgments and decisions.

Overall, framing theory draws on multiple theoretical traditions, including sociology, psychology, and communication, to provide a comprehensive understanding of how communication and language influence individuals' perceptions and behaviors. By integrating these different theoretical approaches, framing theory provides a powerful lens for understanding the role of language and communication in shaping public opinion and decision-making

2.2.3 Key Concepts in Framing Theory

Framing theory is based on the concept that the way in which information is presented or "framed" can significantly influence how people interpret it. The theory proposes that communicators can strategically choose certain frames to shape the way people perceive and understand an issue or event. The goal of framing is to influence the public's opinions, attitudes, and behaviors by selectively highlighting some aspects of an issue while downplaying or ignoring others.

A key concept within framing theory is the frame, which can be defined as a schema of interpretation that individuals use to make sense of a particular issue or event. Frames can be seen as mental shortcuts that people use to process complex information and simplify it into a manageable and coherent form. Frames can vary depending on individual characteristics, such as culture, values, and beliefs, as well as the context in which they are presented.

Another important concept within framing theory is framesets, which refer to the collection of frames used to interpret an issue or event. Framesets can include multiple frames, which can be activated or suppressed depending on the communication context. Framesets can also be hierarchical, with certain frames having greater importance or salience than others.

Frame analysis is the process of identifying, categorizing, and analyzing frames within a particular communication context. Frame analysis can be used to understand how different frames are used to construct meaning, shape perceptions, and influence attitudes and behaviors. The analysis can also reveal the power dynamics involved in framing, such as which actors are able to control or dominate the framing process.

Overall, these key concepts provide a framework for understanding how framing theory works and how communicators can use it to influence public opinion. By strategically selecting and activating certain frames within framesets, communicators can shape the way people perceive and understand an issue or event, with the ultimate goal of achieving their desired outcomes.

2.3 Application of Framing Theory to Newspaper Headlines

The purpose of newspaper headlines goes beyond mere information dissemination. They have the power to influence the reader's perception of a sports event by framing the story in a particular way. This is where framing theory comes in, providing a lens to analyze how the presentation of news impacts the audience's interpretation. By analyzing newspaper headlines in Algerian sports newspapers, we can better understand how information is presented and how it can affect the reader's emotional response to sports events.

To analyze the effects of newspaper headlines on the reader's perception of sports events, we need to compare and contrast different examples of headlines and how they frame the same event differently. For instance, a headline that reads "Algeria Triumphs Over Senegal in Africa Cup of Nations Final" frames the story positively, emphasizing Algeria's victory. On the other hand, a headline that reads "Senegal Falts in Africa Cup of Nations Final Against Algeria" frames the story negatively, emphasizing Senegal's defeat. The choice of words, tone, and framing techniques used in a headline can all work together to shape the reader's understanding of the news.

However, framing theory is not without limitations. It assumes that readers are passive receivers of information and ignores the fact that readers can actively interpret and reject the framing of news. Additionally, it may oversimplify the complex relationship between media and audience. Nonetheless, applying framing theory to the analysis of newspaper headlines in Algerian sports newspapers can provide valuable insights into how information is presented and how it can influence the reader's perception of sports events.

2.4. Conclusion

The chapter examines various framing techniques used in Algerian sports newspapers to shape news coverage. These techniques include the use of positive and negative language, emotional appeals, and neutral frames, among others. The framing of sports news can impact readers' perceptions and opinions on certain topics, particularly when it comes to political and social issues. Moreover, applying framing theory to newspaper headlines illustrates how journalists strategically frame news to attract readers' attention and influence their interpretation of events.

By analyzing headlines in Algerian sports newspapers, it reveals how framing techniques are used to emphasize certain aspects of the story, such as the performance of the Algerian national team or the challenges faced by Algerian athletes. Overall, the chapter demonstrates the importance of comprehending framing techniques in sports news coverage, particularly in the context of Algerian sports media. Examining how news is framed can provide a more nuanced understanding of how media can shape public opinion and influence societal attitudes towards sports, politics, and culture.

The headlines of sports news pieces that were published in three Algerian newspapers-90 Dakika, Bola, and Al-Bilad, were analyzed in this study using Entman's framing theory. With the use of this theory, it was possible to determine the vital components that were employed in the headlines of the articles and how they may have affected readers' impressions.

3.2.2. Research Approaches

In order to conduct our research, it is essential to adopt a suitable research approach. Researchers need to be aware of the various approaches available and choose the most appropriate one.

3.4. Discussion of Results

Entman's framing theory was used to analyze the sports news headlines in Algerian media and the result produced several intriguing results. First, it was discovered that most headlines depicted sporting events as competitive contents with winners and losers, highlighting the significance of success and victory. This framing was especially noticeable in headlines that discussed upcoming contests or matches as well as their preparation.

The analysis also showed that there was a strong emphasis on specific players or teams as the main actors in sports events, as seen in the following headline, "أعرف إمكانياتي جيدا و سأكافح من أجل " النجاح " this framing frequently led to the portrayal of the individuals or groups as heroes or villains, moral judgments regarding their actions being made. The performance of Algerian national teams was frequently mentioned in headlines, which made this particularly clear.

Additionally, it was discovered that the headlines frequently used judgmental language to convey the significance of football matches and the accomplishments of athletes. The use of words like (crucial, vital) (محبطون), influenced how the audience perceived the circumstances and the participants.

Overall, this study's findings show how important framing theory is for analyzing sports news headlines in Algerian media. The language written by the journalists when creating these headlines have a significant impact on how readers perceive sports events and participants, so they merit careful consideration and analysis.

3.5. General Discussion of the Findings

The results of this study demonstrate the influence of framing theory on audience perceptions of sports news headlines in Algeria. Through the application of Entman's framing theory, we identified five key framing elements in the headlines analyzed: problem definition, problem evaluation, moral judgment, and solution suggestion. Our analysis revealed that Algerian sports news headlines often employed frames that emphasized the importance of winning, highlighted the potential negative consequences of losing, and praised individual athletes for their successes.

These frame elements were found to have a significant impact on audience perceptions of Algerian sports news, shaping their understanding of the issues and players involved. The use of evaluative language and moral judgments in particular had a strong impact on how audiences viewed the events and individuals discussed in the headlines. Additionally, the framing of certain issues as urgent or significant was found to create a sense of urgency and importance among audiences.

Overall, the findings of this study highlight the important role of framing theory in shaping audience perceptions of sports news in Algeria. These results have important implications for media professionals, suggesting that they should be aware of the power of framing and its potential impact on audience perceptions. Further research is needed to explore the long-term effects of framing on audience attitudes and behaviors.

3.6. Conclusion

In conclusion, the study of sports news headlines in Algeria using the framing theory has revealed how language is used by reporters to influence how people perceive the headlines , the study shows that different frames was applied such as placing the blame or responsibility on others and emphasizing particular solutions or acts, the result shows that journalist should be conscious of the language and the framing they use because these can have influence on how people interpret events and the study has also shown how crucial it is to consider language when analyzing media because it can expose underlying presumptions and biases.

General Conclusion

In conclusion, this research has explored discourse analysis as a field of study that analyzes the content of written or oral language to understand how meaning is constructed and conveyed. By examining the use of language in different contexts, this research highlights the importance of discourse analysis in understanding how language shapes our perceptions and Entman's framing theory that was applied to newspaper headlines. All that was explored in three chapters.

The Study's first chapter, which served as theoretical foundation for the investigation, analyzed relevant discourse and important studies that discussed framing theory in sports newspapers context, the second chapter was devoted to framing theory and offered a detailed examination of its concepts, key components, and applicability to the world of sports journalism. The third chapter described the research technique, which included gathering and analyzing sports news headlines from Algeria and tools and applications of Entman framing theory in headlines.

The findings of the study showed that multiple frame elements were employed to cover events, demonstrating the subjectivity of news reporting and the potential for bias in media coverage. Additionally, the study found that certain frames were more common in certain newspapers, indicating a possible influence on negative frames and how the journalist focuses on the losses and personal aspect of the players and the teams in news reporting. The research aimed to uncover the elements of Entman's framing theory by applying them to Algerian headlines and summarize the findings of the description of the elements.

First of all, it is advised that reporters be knowledgeable about the possible impacts of framing on readers perceptions and attitudes toward sports activities and teams. While focusing on the positive aspects of teams or the players while consciously highlighting certain aspects of a story over others.

Second, future studies could examine how framing elements can be applied on various media platforms, including Prints, television, and social media, research might also look at how various framing strategies affect audience responses and actions.

Finally, it's advised that researchers work together to create standards or rules for framing sports news. By following these rules, it might be possible to prevent audiences from being tricked or misled by the headlines and also ensure that news is presented in a fair and balance manner, this study highlighted the key elements of Entman framing theory applied in sports news headlines in Algeria and the need for further research and ethical considerations in this area by taking more conscious approach to framing.

Overall, the study tries to contribute to the understanding of media framing in Algeria and highlight the need for further research in this area. It also sheds light on the important of considering Entman's elements approach when analyzing media framing in different outlets

الإصابات زادت من تعقيد الوضع

وبالإضافة إلى ضعف مستوى المجموعة، فإن الإصابات التي تعاني منها عناصر الفريق منذ بداية الموسم وإلى غاية لقاء أول أمس زادت الطين بلة ، حيث كانت مشتكلا بوجاه الوداد في

بتسجيله 3 أهداف فقط، وهي الحصيلة التي تؤكد ضعف الفريق من جميع النواحي.

إيجيل لم يجد المخرج

وعلى الرغم من أن تغيير المدرب كان بمرحى تحقيق الوتية وعودة الفريق لسكة الصلحة، إلا أن المدرب الجديد مزيان إيجيل مازال لم يضع بعد بصمته، حيث أنه قاد الفريق في 6 مباريات كاملة إلا أنه عجز عن قيادته نحو تلذوق حلالة الانتصارات، بعد أن اكتفى بر 3 تعادلات واحد منها كان داخل أسوار ملعب العقيد لطفى، كما خسر في 3 مناسبات، التناز منها جاءنا داخل الديار ضد شبيبة الساوره وإتحاد العاصمة ، زيادة على الخسارة في مباراة أول أمس والتي لم يشرف عليها بسبب إصابته بفيروس كورونا ، لكون بذلك إيجيل قد غيب كل الأمل المتعلقة عليه، بما أن الجميع كان ينتظر منه قيادة الوداد إلى بر الأمان، لكن العكس حدث لعادة الآن

الضيق وضع قدما في القسم الأسفل

وأمام النتائج المتواضعة المسجلة وضعف مستوى العناصر المتواجدة في التعداد، والتي أثبت معظمها

ياسين

قبل أربع جولات على نهاية مرحلة ذهاب بطولة الرابطة المحترفة الأولى، بعد إجراء لقاءات الجولة 13 التي انقاد خلالها و داد تلمسان إلى خسارة مبهنة في السريعة التي قادته إلى شلغوم العبد بنتيجة ثلاثة أهداف مقابل واحد ، يكون فريق و داد تلمسان قد وضع قدما في القسم الثاني وذلك نظرا للحصيلة الهزيلة التي سجلتها لحد الآن حيث جمع 6 نقاط فقط من 3 انتصارات و 3 تعادلات، وهي أضعف حصيلة تسجلها تشكيلة المدرب إيجيل في تاريخ الوداد ضمن بطولة الكبار، فحسب في موسمي 2008/2007 و 2012/2013 اللذين نزل فيهما إلى الدرجة الثانية لم يكن بهذا الضعف، بدليل أنه في الموسم الأول كان يمتلك 11 نقطة، وفي الموسم الآخر كان في صيداه 8 نقاط

الدفاع والهجوم يعانيان

وزيادة على تسو لضعفه في مؤخره ترتيب الرابطة المحترفة الأولى، فإن دفاع الوداد يتواجد في المرتبة الأخيرة بعد ثلثة جولات، كما أنه يمتلك ثالث أسوأ خط هجوم خلف هلال شلغوم العبد وجمعية الشلف

الإدارة تتفق مع سليمانى وبوصاية أشرف على حصة أمس
